Your veterinary surgeon has indicated that they are prepared to visit your premises during the COVID-19 outbreak in order to attend your horse. In doing so they are potentially placing themselves at risk and you should respect the guidance they have provided which not only aims to protect them, but also you or your staff. If physical distancing and biosecurity measures are not respected then this and future veterinary visits are unlikely to be possible.

If anyone at the property exhibits signs of COVID-19 (such as a high temperature or persistent cough) or is self-isolating or is considered vulnerable to COVID-19 (age > 70, underlying health condition, pregnancy) then you should inform your veterinary surgeon immediately.

If anyone at the property develops signs that could be due to COVID-19 prior to the visit, then you MUST contact your veterinary surgeon immediately.

Your vet will minimise the time spent at your property. You should not expect your vet to enter into discussion at the time but rather collect a history beforehand and inform you of their findings/instructions by telephone or video.

- Only one person from your property should assist the veterinary surgeon (even if horses belonging to a number of different owners are being examined/treated) except in exceptional circumstances such as a foaling and, even then, only when instructed by the veterinary surgeon.
- Physical distancing (at least 2 metres) should be maintained throughout the veterinary visit.
- A strategy for sedation may be discussed with you to facilitate the examination/treatment without compromising physical distancing. Your vet may want to sedate the horse to allow physical distancing when in normal circumstances sedation would not be necessary; you should respect your veterinary surgeon’s judgement or postpone the visit until there is less risk to human health from COVID-19.
- Gloves should be worn by everyone throughout the visit.
- You should not touch any veterinary equipment and should remain a minimum of 2 metres from it and from the vet’s car at all times.
- You should determine where the veterinary surgeon can park so that they can avoid contact with others on the yard and minimise the length of their visit. A means of alerting you to the vet’s arrival should also be discussed.
- You should not expect the vet to enter an office, house, coffee room or any other building other than to see the horse or wash their hands. Your vet is likely to prefer not to enter any buildings to wash their hands, but rather will wear gloves and use hand sanitiser.
- Please ensure there are facilities for handwashing available. If there are none then make the vet aware of this prior to the visit.
- Do not expect your vet to do additional tasks that have not been discussed prior to their visit.
- Please be considerate and respectful to your vet. There is no obligation for them to place themselves at risk by attending your property at this challenging time.
